

A Career in International Relations

A career in international relations offers an exciting and dynamic pathway for those passionate about global affairs, diplomacy, and cross-cultural communication. In the UK, opportunities abound in areas such as the Foreign, Commonwealth & Development Office, international organisations like the United Nations, non-governmental organisations (NGOs), think tanks, and multinational corporations.

Job roles vary from diplomats and policy analysts to international trade consultants and humanitarian workers. Salaries can range from £25,000 for entry-level roles to over £100,000 for senior positions, depending on experience, location, and sector.

To prepare for this career, A-levels in subjects like Politics, History, Economics, or Geography are highly beneficial. A modern language, such as French, Spanish, or Mandarin, is essential for developing cross-cultural skills and increasing employability in this competitive field.

With a commitment to understanding global challenges and strong academic foundations, a career in international relations can be both rewarding and impactful.